Description:

Most youth play video games for over an hour each day. The video game industry is in a period of rapid growth and evolution which creates challenges for researchers in understanding the impact on players. While there are positive and negative aspects of video game play, excessive play time is commonly associated with poor mental and physical health. Especially coming out of the pandemic when families relied heavily on technology for support, it is essential that caretakers learn to manage their children's gaming habits. Caretakers can utilize available resources to establish an evidence-based family media plan and make informed decisions regarding appropriateness of game content. Primary preventative principles include increased parent familiarity of games, improved communication, limits set on play times and zones, and earned game play by consistently meeting a set of family priorities.

Learning Objectives:

After completion of this presentation, participants will be able to name the following:

- 1) Attendees will recite at least three facts regarding trends in youth gaming habits
- 2) Attendees will create a family media plan for screen time management
- 3) Attendees will list at least one strategy and one resource to help caretakers monitor content

Presenter:

Steve Arcidiacono, Ph.D., is a licensed clinical psychologist (PY10133) specializing in behavioral pediatrics and cognitive-behavioral therapy with youth and their families. Dr. Steve received his Ph.D. in clinical psychology from Nova Southeastern University.
